tus peculiar to the frog. For the hands men, and like him, too, was fortunate in he has a large membranous fin, which a wife who resembled him in this reis held to its place by loops passing spect, over his fingers and a strap around the waist. The surface presented to the water by these fins is so large as to add greatly to the effectiveness of the strokes of the arm, but not so large as to exhaust the muscular power. Their effect is to very much reduce the effort usually required in swimming. But the greatest ingenuity is displayed in the form and fitness of the fins for the legs, which are attached to the ankles, and are so formed that they act upon the water, both in the movement of bringing the legs and throwing them back. They act so finely in treading water, as swimmers call it, that one can walk, if not on the water; at least in it. The difference between swimming with this apparatus and without it is very much like the difference between rowing a boat with the handle and a blade of an oar. The old swimmer has no trouble
